Age and association

Do older married couples who play together stay together?

According to Jay Mancini, associate professor of family and child development in Virginia Tech's College of Human Resources, the optimal use of time, including leisure time, has a definite effect on the marital relationship in old age.

One outcome of retirement and changes in family responsibilities, such as children leaving home, is an increase in the amount of leisure time available to a couple. Since three-fourths of older men (65 years of age or older) and almost 40 percent of older women have a spouse who is still living with them, Mancini feels it is important to examine the effect of the use of leisure time on the marital relationship.

"While life is not so simple as that suggested by the popular phrase, 'the family or couple that plays together stays together,' spending time together can strengthen the marriage of older people," Mancini said. However, it can also cause disharmony.

Two dimensions of leisure, activity patterns and activity preferences, are of particular importance.

Mancini groups leisure activities in three major categories. Independent activities are performed without the participation of others. Parallel leisure activities are independent activities in a group setting, such as watching television, where interaction with others is possible but not required. Collaborative activities require participation of others, such as playing card games and visiting with friends or relatives.

For the most part, Mancini explains, marriages work best when there is a blending of activity patterns that provides opportunities for both individual and couple recreation. A potential problem for married couples who are together a great deal of the time is that they are sometimes unable to act on their leisure preferences. What one would like to do with his or her time and what is actually done are often quite different. So couples need to attempt to negotiate and balance preferences to avoid disharmony and weakening of the marriage bond.
